Persistent pulmonary hypertension in the newborn (PPHN) has been associated with a survival rate of less than 25%. We retrospectively reviewed 34 patients with congenital diaphragmatic hernia to determine the effect of four-stage management on survival. The infants were divided into two groups. Group 1 (n = 26) infants were treated exclusively with pressure support ventilation. Infants in group 2 (n = 8) underwent two-staged repair (gastrostomy, primary repair). Total procedure time, percentage of oxygenation, blood gas measurements, postoperative ventilation, and 24-hour weight gain were determined. There was a significant increase in the ability to provide low pressure support ventilation with increased attempts and time to achieve desired pressure support ventilation during a 24-hour study period.

The 24-hour mean blood gas values in survivors to hospital discharge were significantly improved over those of non-survivors. All infants survived in group 1, while none of the survivors in group 2 died before hospital discharge. Congenital diaphragmatic hernia associated with PPHN is generally treated with ventilation support and oxygenation. In the two-
