They call the system a "water computer." "We have developed a platform to monitor water quality and make that data available over the web so that it can be shared," said John Kopf, a professor at the School of Computer Science. The team's computer-powered system can be installed in water towers, and can map the water coming into a city. It would allow water managers to know that a water tower was full of raw sewage if they didn't know already. The system monitors raw water through a pump. It would then analyze the water and show the quality of the water from one city to the next. "It's a really cool idea," said Jonathan Hess, a specialist in computer sciences at M.I.T. "It's a way to make sure the water being collected from multiple sources and tanks is safe." To date, the system has been installed in a water tower in Switzerland. Two more towers are in the works, and the team has completed a pilot installation in India. The system is being used for monitoring wastewater in Bangalore.

"Not only will our system help the workers at the sewage collection system, it will also help engineers measure the changes in the system when they modify it," Kopf said. The system tracks the time and water entering the towers, then combines that data with data from sensors in the towers. "It's an interesting problem," said Mike Thomas, director of the Water Research Center at Carnegie Mellon. "The water is moving at a rate of about a million gallons a day in a tower that is about 100 feet tall. As a system, it consists of a network of sensors, pumps, microcontrollers and data transmitting/receiving devices." Most of the system's work is done using a laptop computer and a wireless connection to the Internet. Using the system, CMU water specialists have worked in India and Bangalore to make sure the city's water is safe. Some of the problems were caused by the city's sewage treatment plant, which hasn't been modernized in 25 years. "The biggest issue we found
